

THE REMIX

THE MAGNIFICENT SEVEN
Coming soon to a saloon
(or brasserie) near you. LEE CARTER

1. Jsen Wintle studied under a master Savile Row tailor for five years while launching Wintle, a made-to-measure label that he describes as "masculine noblesse in a modern guise." At Vertice in London.

2. Le Coq Sportif is France's largest sports apparel brand, outfitting Tour de France, World Cup, Grand Slam and Olympic champions. Now the Gallic rooster is coming to America with a line of plucky sweatshirts, bags and sneakers. At Seven in New York.

3. The artist-designer David Saunders creates Op Art patterns and computer-generated graphics for his cultish David David line, which has expanded from tees and tanks to include a full range of kaleidoscopic basics. At Dover Street Market in London.

4. Robert Geller, half of the former New York label Cloak, is back with a men's line of his own. His breezy cotton suits, oversize cardigans and jeans in fluorescent hues recall his halcyon days living in 1980s Los Angeles. At Odin in New York.

5. Hussein Chalayan is tempering his conceptual experiments with a down-to-earth collaboration with the e-tailer Yoox. Polo shirts, T-shirts, shorts, chinos and jeans come in neutral shades with bursts of coral. Go to yoox.com.

6. Raf Simons's debut line of sunglasses is made in collaboration with Linda Farrow. The large, lightweight shades come in futuristic styles and a choice of acetate or aluminum. At Seven and Barneys New York.

7. Oskar Metsavaht, who has expanded from his native Brazil to New York with two Osklen locations, updates gray linen pants and straw anoraks with steel thread and carbon fibers. At Osklen, 97 Wooster Street.
